From the Rotary Website... Ask Rosemary

I live in an area with more senior citizens than young people. How do we go about finding young people to join? Peggy Scott, 53, Rotary Club of Benson, Ariz., USA

The first thing I'd say is really look at your business community. Look at the demographics, and find out if the people you see most often are actually the dominant population in your community. There's somebody in town running the restaurants and the banks. There are lawyers and doctors who are serving the population. How old are they? When I really started getting into this whole "getting younger" business, I started looking in my local paper, philanthropic newsletters, and other journals. In Washington, we have something in the Puget Sound Business Journal called "Forty Under 40." Every year, it features 40 up-and-coming business people under the age of 40. I always look and ask, are these people Rotarians? So, I suggest examining your community first. Then, if the demographics truly are older, well, you can be young at heart.
